

deux good

Parents with autistic children can take heart now that leading umbilical cord blood service provider, Cordlife, has joined forces with autism and epilepsy treatment pioneer, Dr Michael G Chez, to do a study on childhood autism in Singapore. Research is also being carried out on the possibility of using umbilical cord blood stem cells to treat this condition. Visit www.cordlife.com or send your queries to therapy@cordlife.com.

know profile

Raising awareness among Singaporeans about autism, a developmental condition – this is what Grey Group Singapore's philanthropic arm, Grey for Good, is doing. Teaming up with St Andrew's Autism Centre, which is marking its 10th anniversary, and World Autism Awareness (Singapore), it hopes to encourage society to embrace and accept autism sufferers. Autistic adults often face hurdles when seeking employment, such as widespread discrimination, lack of vocational training and inadequate support with job placements. The non-profit integrated centre, which educates, trains and cares for autistic people, is located at 1 Elliot Road, 6517-3800.

